

My professional Growth

On completion of the first two units of the course, I have undergone professional growth in several ways. First, in writing my papers or communicating my points, I need to understand my audience and organize my work in a clear and concise way to avoid misunderstanding. Besides, my writing should be ethical and based on egalitarian principles because the audience is composed of people with diverse cultural backgrounds and beliefs. I have also learned the various steps of revising my work and reviewing other peoples' writing through evaluating the content, the organization, style, and readability.

When writing my innovation paper, I learned that business writing also requires extensive research to establish robust findings backed up with current data or information. This implies that when handling such writing in future, I must target at producing justifiable results based on the current trends. From the peer review, I realized that there are some mistakes I make in my writing which can only be pointed out by a peer or a second reader. The activity of reviewing my classmates' innovation paper helped me to understand how to evaluate and acknowledge the work of others. Therefore, I learned that vigorous revision is the key processes of producing a successful and acceptable document.

A collaborative setting is composed of people with different cultural values and beliefs. In chapter one, we learned about responsibilities of an effective communicator. From this chapter, I believe that collaborative engagement will highly depend on ethical and egalitarian behavior. Ethical communication, based on trust and respect, will influence cultures and facilitate positive transformation. On the other hand, the egalitarian behavior will nurture an equal environment that offers same opportunities and expectations regardless of individual differences.
